Quadrant celebrating 65 super years

With over six decades of solid performance behind them, Tasmanian super fund Quadrant is looking ahead and according to CEO Wayne Davy is definitely not ready for retirement yet!

The member owned fund has gone from strength to strength as the only local fund to achieve a fourth consecutive national gold rating for its superannuation products, complemented by a team of in-house expert financial advisors, straight forward communications and member education programs.

To coincide with the funds 65th birthday, Quadrant has launched a new and improved website to enhance its online services. Completely redesigned with a fresh look, the new site is designed to provide the funds 6300 members with an even more interactive channel to manage their super and retirement planning.

Launching the new website to members, Wayne Davy said that the fund is committed to constantly enhancing its communications to help members navigate their way through the super maze.

“We’re really pleased to be able to introduce an enhanced website that offers innovative tools such as our new risk profiler to help members become even more actively involved in their investment,” he said.

“Because the very nature of super makes it all a bit complicated at times, we’ve also worked hard to offer every member a relevant source of information and tips in a much more tailored way through our new life stages sections. These sections cover areas specially designed for different age groups such as starting out in super, 35 – 49 year olds, pre retirement through to retirement.”

“It provides every member, regardless of where they are in their super life stage, with very specific information to help them understand and get the most from their super and retirement.”

Quadrant started in 1944 when most local government councils in Tasmania pooled their resources to form the Municipal Employees Assurance Scheme (MEAS). MEAS operated successfully for more than half a century and in 1998 the fund changed its name to Quadrant Superannuation.

“I don’t think anyone would have ever imagined this type of technology when the fund started back in 1944, but we’re certainly pleased to be keeping up with the rapid changes in the online world to offer the very best service to our members.”
